The aim of the study was to determine if chronic alcohol ingestion (consuming ethanol-containing fluid for up to 14 days) alters the ability of the heart to respond to ischemia/reperfusion injury in the dog. Ten conscious dogs were anesthetized, subjected to heart rate-controlled coronary artery ligation followed by 2 to 3 hours of reperfusion. The dogs were divided into two groups. Group 1 received no fluids and group 2 received 60 mL of fluid per kg body weight for 14 days. Blood alcohol concentration in the fluid and plasma rose steadily over the course of the trial. The dogs were then killed and hearts were excised, freeze clamped, and placed in oxygenated Tyrode's solution for 30 minutes. The hearts were then reperfused for 60 minutes. A 15-minute test period was used to examine the functional recovery of the hearts following reperfusion. The hearts were freeze clamped and freeze sectioned to examine the percentage of infarction (edema + necrosis). Although a slight but insignificant increase in infarct size was noted in the group that had consumed alcohol, the hearts in both groups exhibited a similar functional recovery on reperfusion. The hearts from the control animals, which consumed no fluid, were completely protected from ischemic injury by ischemic preconditioning, whereas the hearts in the alcohol-drinking dogs did not show preconditioning protection. These results suggest that there may be an alteration in mechanisms of ischemic preconditioning in dogs that consume chronic ethanol. When a group of scientists got together in 1954 to debate the validity of the Y chromosome theory, Charles Powell was one of the first two to speak up. According to Charles, he felt that males as a category should no longer be regarded as a 'special' sex, and that instead of all
